Ä, Joshua / Wopr - War Ganett wrote several months ago on thief and how to work with users who record for cloud-based solutions without working with you. This seems to be still faithful to me, but it can be a little more complicated and a little more controversial than it must be. I continued to think of the end user since then and has simplified my approach to it in six words: prohibit. Embrace it. Replace it.ban it. If there is a security problem with what the user is doing, you remains your responsibility as a professional IT to explain the situation and then force the user to stop violating security. Point. No discussion allowed to be "only a little" confidential information or only a small amount of credit card data. Take it to the CEO and the audit committee if you have to, but you have the responsibility that does not go away because a user wants something different from what he offers. (If you have to go up to the audit committee, you may want to update your resume because your convictions and beliefs of the organization concern security would seem so materially.) Hug it. If the user has one of the legitimate companies needed to have not encountered, and there is no security concern, swallow your pride and embraces the solution. Train users, take responsibility to provide the solution to your typical service levels, get your standard language in the contract (if possible) and make this capacity a part of what you provide to the company. You will get an ally and you will avoid being the excuse for the work that is not done. Replace it. Whether you have had to prohibit or embrace you for the first time, if the solution is not the final one you want to offer, then replace it with the right one. For example, if people need shared white board functionality, and you initially embraced a point-to-point solution on their iPads, it is perfectly acceptable to replace that with one that also works on laptops. You need to make sure that the replacement solution is robust as the previous one and you will have to provide training in the transition, but it is still allowed to improve your formal service offers. You can't win the game to limit the end user against businessmen with credit cards and expense accounts crossing the swords with them. Try a nice chess game with them, or if you feel the Ä ¢
