How can i find out how much my pokemon cards are worth

Photo Courtesy: Product images via eBay; Nintendo Attention, '90s kids: do you have trunks and boxes filled with old Beanie Babies, Pokémon cards, and Polly Pockets? Maybe a Furby or two? Well, if you've held onto some of these popular toys from your childhood — or from your kid's younger years — you may be in luck. Today, many of these once-beloved items are worth a pretty penny. Although it might be hard to believe that toys from the 1990s are considered "vintage," there's simply no denying the increase in value many of these collectibles have seen, especially if they're still in mint condition. So, how does this all work? Why are these toys "trendy" again? And, most importantly, which toys are worth the most money? It's time to go on a scavenger hunt through your basement. It's popular for people to collect old, vintage toys. They're nostalgic and they gain more appreciation 20 years after they were first released on the market. Moreover, toys are usually "retired" — that is, manufacturers stop making them — which makes them harder to come by. Now, '90s toys that might've been inexpensive back in the day are considered rare. And, with rarity, comes monetary value. Photo Courtesy: Vladimir Gerdo/TASS/Getty Images If kept in good condition, certain toys can help pay for large expenses. Seriously, did you ever think your Pokémon cards would help you pay your car bill? Or that a Beanie Baby could make a mortgage payment a bit easier? Well, you might get lucky. Of course, the market fluctuates, so nothing is a sure bet. But if you have something rare and in good condition — or, better yet, in a box — then you might just have a valuable item or two on your hands. To get started, research the toys you already own. Rare, "retired" toys are always worth more than toys that are still sold on the market today. Want an easy way to look up a toy's going rate? Try eBay. In most cases, you'll find other folks trying to sell something similar, if not the exact toy you're looking to peddle. If you can't find your hot commodity on eBay, try a specialist collector website, like World Collectors Net, which offers price guides for a variety of toys. Photo Courtesy: Yamaguchi Haruyoshi/Sygma/Getty Images Before listing your toys, clean them — carefully. If they're still sealed and in the box, dust the box. If the toys have been played with, grab a toothbrush, paintbrush, Q-tip, or paper towel — and some water. Be sure to let the toys dry overnight. Once you're ready to sell, list your rare toys on online auctions like eBay and Facebook Marketplace. Sometimes you can find a local business that deals in second-hand products, but, often, these collectors won't pay the full amount the item is worth. In the '90s, (almost) everyone collected Pokémon Trading Card Game cards. Even then, some of the cards were nearly impossible to find at stores. For example, Charizard, a fire-breathing dragon whose card featured a holographic background, was one of the most popular during the '90s — and that rarity has held up. Although Pokémon has been going strong for 25 years, the franchise recently gained even more popularity in light of Pokémon Go, especially since the VR game featured the original 150 monsters from the original run. Photo Courtesy: Peter Power/Toronto Star/Getty Images To sell for a high price, Pokemon cards must be in good condition, free from creases or tears. On the high end, a mint-condition holographic, shadowless Charizard card is worth between $12,999 to $50,000. A first edition version of the card — released in 1999 — is worth $269,999. Other rare Pokémon cards, including Kangaskhan (I know, right?) and Blastoise sell between $99,999 and $484,890 each. The question now is not if you caught 'em all, but did you hold onto 'em all? Hopefully that's a yes. Before Pokémon cards took over, elementary school students traded their most colorful POGs during lunch and recess hours. Also known as milk caps, POGs are a children's game that uses flat, circular, cardboard milk caps. Players stack these caps and take turns dropping a heavier object on them so that the POGs scatter. The player then keeps the face-up POGs, but restacks the face-down ones. This process goes on and on until none of the POGs land face-down. Photo Courtesy: Xavier ROSSI/Gamma-Rapho/Getty Images Whoever has the most POGs wins the game. But can the same be said for folks who held onto their POGs until 2021? Well, POGs are still incredibly beloved today because of the way they really capture nostalgia. How so? Often, POGs are tied to pop culture fads and feature images from franchises like Power Rangers, Star Trek, The Wizard of Oz, The Simpsons and Nintendo. However, that doesn't mean they're worth a lot of money. In fact, most POGs are worth a dollar, maybe $10 at most. While some rare pop culture POGs, including defective, misprinted ones, are more valuable, they'll only rake in $40 to $250 or so in most cases. Fun Fact: POGs became the name of the game that was commercially sold in the 1990s because folks used Pog brand juice caps to play the game previously. The brand, Pog, derived its name from its ingredients: passionfruit, orange, and guava. In the '90s, everyone collected Beanie Babies. They were one of the most popular toys of the decade. In fact, it seemed like there was a Beanie Baby for every type of animal, personality trait, and world event. The toys were inexpensive upon their release, but, even in the '90s, some of the rarest skyrocketed in value. Today, quite a few are worth hundreds (or thousands) of dollars. Photo Courtesy: Aaron Francis/Getty Images While many Beanie Babies are worth just $25 or so, others, including the rare Peace bear, are worth anywhere from $200 and $4,899. Beanie Babies with noticeable errors are worth more, ranging from $1,800 and $4,000. Who knew those plush TY toys would be worth so much money? Well, your parents probably knew — which is why they encouraged you to leave the tags intact. Here's hoping you held onto all those small pieces that went along with the Polly Pocket playhouse set. Made between 1989 and 1998, the original, pocket-sized Polly Pockets — so long as they are still sealed — are actually more valuable than the larger playsets Mattel made after buying the brand in 1998. Even if your playset was used lightly, collectors will still find value in those authentic originals, namely because they are near-impossible to find today. Photo Courtesy: Aimee Ray/Flickr For example, compact playsets sell for between $50 and $250 on eBay. Meanwhile, a sealed Polly Pocket Fairy Light Wonderland set is worth $525. Other sets and figurines sell for nearly $900. Needless to say, if you can manage to find every part of your old Polly Pocket set, you'll be smiling all the way to the bank. Everyone wanted to own a Furby in the '90s — and, if you didn't, you probably thought they were a bit creepy. After all, their large eyes seem to follow you wherever you go. Well, if you (or your kid) were too afraid to take the toy out of its box, you might just strike gold. In fact, original, unopened Furby toys are valued between $400 and $700. As with any toy, limited-edition Furbies might net you even more. Photo Courtesy: Matthew Fearn/PA Images/Getty Images While toys are meant to be played with, you might be thanking your younger self for keeping certain items in their boxes or in some fancy trading card sleeves. Although it can be hard to part with nostalgia, there's no need to hold on to every toy these days, especially if you're looking to downsize or do some spring cleaning. All of this to say, if you need some quick cash, check out your toy collection. You might be surprised to find just how many valuable items are tucked away in your basement! Photo Courtesy: 10'000 Hours/DigitalVision/Getty Images Getting a credit card is a fairly straightforward process that requires you to submit an application for a card and receive an approval or denial. The result of an application is mostly based on your credit score, although other factors are relevant to some banks. If you already have good credit, your score generally impacts your credit limits on cards as well as your likelihood of approval. If you've never applied for credit before or you need to rebuild your credit after having some negative credit issues, getting the approval you need can be a little more challenging. Before you rack up a number of credit inquiries — which slightly reduce your credit score — by randomly applying for cards, take some time to learn which credit card issuers are most likely to approve your application. Start by checking out these tips on getting a credit card and using it wisely. The main factor used in determining whether an applicant is approved for a credit card is the person's credit score. Before you apply, you can ask for a free copy of your credit report and your score from each of the three main credit reporting agencies: Experian, Equifax and TransUnion. According to the Fair Credit Reporting Act, you are entitled to a free copy of your report from each agency every 12 months. However, you can also get an estimate of your score at any time from other free or low-cost services, such as Credit Karma. Photo Courtesy: 10'000 Hours/DigitalVision/Getty Images A credit score below 580 is considered poor, 580-669 is considered fair, 670-739 is classified as good, 740 to 799 hits the level of very good and 800 to 850 is exceptional. On the low end of the spectrum, if your score is poor, it doesn't mean you won't qualify for a credit card. However, the cards you qualify for may have high yearly fees or high interest rates. Despite their shortcomings, these cards can be used to establish and build your credit when you don't have other better options available. Beyond your credit score, the main thing a credit card company cares about is your ability to make monthly payments on the account. They will take your age and income into consideration when determining this. If you're younger than 21, you need to be able to prove that you have steady income and that you are able to afford the monthly payments on the card. If you're older than 21, you still have to meet certain requirements, but you may already have some type of payment history for credit card companies to review before making a decision about issuing credit to you. One of the questions on the credit card application will ask for information about your yearly or monthly income. Most of the time, credit card companies won't fact check this information, but it's wise to be honest about your income, not just for the creditor's sake, but for your own. If you're already struggling to make ends meet, getting a new credit card could prompt you to spend money you can't afford to pay back, and that's never a good idea. You can always speak to a financial counselor for additional guidance prior to applying. The higher your credit score, the better your chance of getting approved for credit. High scores allow you to be more selective about your choice of credit card. If your credit is in the good range or above, make sure you pay close attention to details and choose a card that doesn't have a high (or any) yearly fee and that has a competitive APR (annual percentage rate). For reference, a good APR today is generally below 17.57%, according to the Federal Reserve, but credit card rates tend to continuously increase over time. Photo Courtesy: Boy Anupong/Moment/Getty Images Some credit card companies also offer rewards, such as cash back on purchases or rewards toward purchases — Amazon gift cards, for example — so this is something to take into consideration. Be aware that some credit card companies charge an annual fee, but plenty of banks do not. This is why it's incredibly important to read the fine print before filling out an application for a credit card. If the card you want comes with a high annual fee, it should offer some really exceptional benefits, such as free hotel upgrades or higher percentages of cash back. Credit cards may have different APRs for different types of purchases. If you anticipate using your card to make cash advances, for instance, you want to check to make sure the card you're applying for has a reasonable APR for cash advances. The APRs for these types of special transactions can be much higher than 17.57%, even on good cards. Most credit card applications are processed online, although you may have received a credit card application in the mail that you can physically fill out and return. Before starting the application, you want to make sure you have all the information on hand that you're likely to need. Most credit card companies will ask for information that is pretty straightforward. Be ready with your name, address, date of birth, maiden name, social security number, employment information and your monthly or yearly income. Photo Courtesy: Eva Katalin/E+/Getty Images If you're applying online, fill out all the required fields and submit the information. In most cases, you will be notified immediately of the credit decision. If you're approved, your card will usually arrive in one to two weeks. If you're denied, you will receive a letter in the mail explaining the reasons for the negative decision. The letter may also include your credit score on record at the bureau used to retrieve your score. In some cases, you may receive a message that the bank needs more information. This is more common with applicants who are applying for credit for the first time. If this happens, follow the instructions for completing the application process. For example, the company may ask for proof of income or proof of identity or both. If you submitted an application by mail, you can expect to receive your card in about four to six weeks if you're approved. If you're denied, the letter with the explanation generally only takes a couple of weeks to arrive. It's very important to use your credit card wisely once you receive it. Far too often, credit card users fall into poor spending patterns that cause their debt to mount quickly. Overusing credit cards can lead to getting stuck in a loop of making only minimum payments while the balance — and interest paid — continues to grow. Photo Courtesy: Predrag Vuckovic/E+/Getty Images Remember that even a "good" APR is quite high at typically more than 17%, so it's good money management to pay your balance in full each month or only keep a small balance on the card. Interest can accrue quickly when you don't pay your balance, and when your card approaches its credit limit, this negatively affects your credit rating. Missed payments and delinquent accounts also tremendously affect your credit score, putting you in danger of not being approved for loans, mortgages and other types of credit you might need. how do i find out how much my pokemon cards are worth. how can i tell how much my pokemon cards are worth. how to find out how much my pokemon cards are worth
